The Good Workman

The good teacher or the good physician or the good carpenter who merely repeat their goodness of the day before are not good but bad workmen. Why? Because every day is a new day with its demands upon us, and we must grow in grace and likewise in knowledge in order to meet them. There is no form of knowledge so complete and final that it cannot be improved, no single human art so perfect that it cannot be made better, no form of human endeavor that does not call for further effort. For this philosophy, life is a perfecting, not an arriving at perfection, and the joy is in the process, not in reaching and remaining at the goal.—Ernest Carroll Moore.
